Nagara temples of the Hoysalas hold important clues about the movement of artisans across the Indian subcontinent, observes Srikumar M Menon.

Eclectic architecture, elegant features

When the distinguished sculptor Dr Upadhyay and his talented son Chhajed arrived from their home town of Ballangre in modern Belgaum district, they brought with them a profound experience. Their working lives were only two among a multitude of artisans moved from the Hoysala kingdom of Hoysala-land, so popularly lauded.

The Hoysalas, who were not only the builders of magnificent temples but also warriors, emerged as a power in the 12th century. Their reign was marked by their architectural magnificence, military prowess which would see the Hoyasala land, the Mule Sankareshwara Temple at Turuvekere; (below) signature of Jakana on the temple plinth.

A typical Bhumija shikhara consists of a superstructure of multiple tiers above the sanctum, each tier decreasing in size, and a squat, stepped tower built later. The Sadashiva Temple at Nagamangala, built in 1170CE, too, has lost its Hoysala tower and currently sports a transformation of the Bhumija style, is echoed in the replacement of the original Hoysala tower.

Indeed, these Nagara temples of the Hoysalas hold important clues about the movement of artisans across the Indian subcontinent and their contribution to architecture, observes Srikumar M Menon.

Corporative workers’ social outreach

Many girls even skipped regular classes during menstruation, which was not about computers.
